ABOUT ME

Sarah Katherine Lawless is a New York City based indie rock singer-songwriter. She has been writing her own songs since she was able to speak, and would like to think her sound has come quite a long way since. Initially dabbling in the realm of singer/songwriter-style ballads, she settled into the indie/alt-rock genre after teaching herself the guitar.

Her creative process can only be described as organic: she writes music as a necessary way to make sense of herself and the world around her, allowing inspiration to come from all directions. Her love of visual design has amplified her ability to weave rich auditory tapestries and connect and collaborate with other artists, something she highly values.

Once compared to a female Jeff Buckley, Sarah Katherine cites influences such as Julia Jacklin, Rufus Wainwright, Madison Cunningham, Queen, and Radiohead. Her aim is always to reach for the unexpected, from unusual chord progressions to experimental theater pieces and everything in between. In doing so, she hopes to create a body of work that is both cathartic and incendiary.

DEBUT EP

“LOOK WHAT I’M LEARNING!”

Indie-Rock Sensation Sarah Katherine Lawless Releases Debut EP "Look What I'm Learning!"

Sarah Katherine Lawless is an emerging talent in the New York City indie music scene, known for her poignant lyricism and raw vocal delivery. With "Look What I'm Learning!", she invites listeners into her world, exploring themes of personal growth, realist perceptions of love, and the journey to self-discovery in your twenties.

Look What I'm Learning!

The standout track, "god you get me," delves deep into the complexities of love and relationships, offering a nuanced portrayal of the highs and lows that come with finding independence in a loving partnership. Through her introspective lyrics and soulful melodies, Lawless captures the essence of vulnerability, authenticity, inviting listeners to their imperfections and celebrate their unique journeys.
